After a session an hour and a half in duration the Commissioners announced that they had been discussing and considering the Q street bridge. They had not considered, it was said, Fire Department matters.

From the office of Commissioner Newman the Commissioners went to Commissioner Harding's office, hastening ahead of the newspaper men. In Commissioner Harding's office they began a nonchalant inspection of an architect's drawing of the bridge. The newspaper men who had followed were admitted. They were told that the board was considering the Q street bridge, but was prepared to say nothing. In response to questions they said that the Sullivan matter was not up for discussion.

DISTRICT BILL "JOKER"
SLIPS THROUGH HOUSE

The District of Columbia appropriation bill, without material amendment, passed the House late today by a vote of 237 to 32. The bill carried approximately $14,350,000 for the District's expenses for the next fiscal year.

Owing to a slip-up among friends of the District on the Republican side, no point of order was made against section 8 in the bill, which provides that all excess District revenues unappropriated by this bill shall revert to the Federal Treasury. This means that about $1,400,000 of District surplus which the District was not allowed to spend will go into the Treasury. The section makes an indirect attack on the half-and-half principle. It is expected, however, that the Senate will eliminate this section.

Congressman Mondell was scheduled to raise a point of order against the section, and said that he had an understanding that he would be notified when it was reached. Chairman Page, in charge of the measure, says he did not so understand the matter. While Mr. Mondell absented himself from the chamber for five minutes the item was reached and passed over, and no other Republican thought of attacking it.

The passage of the District bill was not expected this afternoon, but the House made unprecedented progress on the measure, disposing of more than thirty pages in less than an hour. This accounts for the fact that the attendance was slim when section 8 was reached. A point of no quorum was made to bring in absent members on the final roll call.
